BACKSTORY

Raised in Philadelphia, Morgan was an inquisitive, precocious and insightful child who loved animals, usually more than she liked people. Learning to ride horses at an early age, she knew from then that she wanted to work with animals.

Although she knew she didn't have the means or desire to become a vet, she studied to become a veterinary technician at a local community college and took a job a veterinarian practice in Denton, Delaware that specialized in farm animals.

Morgan spent the next decade helping local farmers care for their animals, riding the horses she cared for as often as the farmers would allow. Living in the country suited Morgan's temperament, and she spent her spare time restoring old furniture and curiosities she found. In addition to letting her ride his horses, David, also taught her to shoot.

As the virus started to abate, David took Morgan in - along with several other waifs and strays - and put them to work on his farm. Things started to feel strangely normal as the weeks turned to months, and having food certainly helped.

Until strangers turned up with guns, killing David's wife and several of the others, driving the remaining few out. Now Morgan just wants to find somewhere she can feel safe again, even if that seems like an impossible dream.
